

There is not currently an official 'open date' for the Healing Home. A realistic timeline involves the hiring of staff. Once staff are in place, they need time to onboard and prepare to receive residents. This could take up to a month. Once staff are ready to receive program participants, it can be communicated to potential Healing Home residents that they may submit an application.

Once staff receive an application, the case worker will review it and if criteria for program participation are met, they will follow up with an initial real time interview with the applicant to begin the process of case management, working towards building an individualized case plan for that person's reentry process if ultimately granted a place within the program. From there, the house manager, along with the case manager, will review the potential candidate's current and past case factors to ensure there are no disqualifying elements that would preclude them from participating in the Healing Home; i.e. arson, serious/violent crimes against children; or sex offenses. Once a candidate is screened beyond this point, there is a review board, consisting of the case worker, house manager and an executive level representative to make the final determination.

Upon acceptance into the Healing Home program at that stage, candidates must still secure a parole grant and have their release plans evaluated and approved by the parole authority. Following approval, a review process of up to 150 days may apply, which includes up to 120 days for full board review and 30 days for gubernatorial review, determined on a case-by-case basis.

There is no set date that results in the Healing Home being at full (or partial) residential capacity. The process will be slow and measured to ensure public safety, program fidelity and successful community reintegration. We anticipate that we would potentially receive our first residents at some point between late October to mid November depending upon their individual case factors. There will be a gradual arrival of participants over time.

The MAXIMUM number of humans that would occupy the entire property at any one time is ten (10). That is eight program participants and two (2) staff members.
